How to run a forge with solar energy

Overview

That way you can convert nearly all solar energy in heat and kept inside, which can be used to heat up the blade. That way no energy is lost due to heat emission, or reflection off the metal.

First, at full sunlight at the equator with perfect efficiency, there's about a kilowatt per square meter. There would be a few ways to "forge" with this. First, there's what you were talking about with a system of mirrors. It will use light to heat the metal in the form of electromagnetic.

The only real problem with using a solar forge would be the difficulty in insulating to obtain a high enough heat throughout a large sample. The pinpoint of light can reach thousands of degrees, but if it is too small it won't be adding enough calories to the system to overcome heat loss. Now if.

A modern solar forge is not only possible but being done, it's a cumbersome mechanism to control it and it's very dangerous. VERY Frosty The Lucky. Do the math: the amount of available energy per sq foot produced by sunlight is well known! Convert to BTUs and compare to forging fuels. I wanted to.

We've had some discussions about using parabolic reflectors for heating metal for forging and while it is certainly possible to get a piece of steel up to forging temperature with reflected sunlight the consensus is that it is too dangerous and impractical when compared to gas, solid fuel, or.
