Paradoxical World: "Not enough Words"

So, as long as one is able to understand what he is being told, the language serves its purpose. When we say that "there are not enough words", we mean that the language is deficient of words to express the feelings that we may have, owing to which we are not able to communicate what we want to.

Too Many Words, and Not Enough

The quantity of words does not guarantee the quality of what is said. We encounter a mass of words, but it is a stark and monolithic mass, composed of abstractions, generic terms, and words that have lost their power to convey a distinct sense to the imagination.
